Historical Context

This is a handwritten entry from a historical church register, specifically recording a stillbirth and subsequent burial. The document is written in German Kurrentschrift. It details the stillbirth of a girl named Anna, born to Johannes Scholz and Anna Maria Motzgerin. The cross (+) in the first column is a traditional symbol used in parish registers to denote a death. The record provides valuable socio-economic context, noting the father's occupation as a cloth maker (Tuchmacher) and the family's residence at House No. 173. The inclusion of the midwife's name (Hebamme) is typical for stillbirth records of this era, as midwives often had to testify to the stillbirth or perform an emergency baptism.

Key Findings

- The document records the stillbirth of a legitimate female child named Anna on April 2 at 12:00 Noon.
- The parents are identified as Johannes Scholz, a Catholic cloth maker, and Anna Maria Motzgerin, also Catholic.
- The family resided locally at House No. 173.
- The child was buried the following day, April 3, in the church.
- The record names the attending midwife, Anna Maria Endigzin, and another individual, Simon Warmuth, likely the priest.

Suggested Next Steps

- You should search for the marriage record of Johannes Scholz and Anna Maria Motzgerin in the same parish registers, which would likely predate this event.
- You should look for birth records of other children born to this couple in the years surrounding this entry to build a complete family group.
- You can explore MyHeritage for family trees or indexed German church records that might include the Scholz family from this specific town.
- You should investigate local guild records for cloth makers (Tuchmacher) in the area, which might provide more information about Johannes Scholz's profession and standing in the community.
- You should check historical maps or cadastral records for House No. 173 to pinpoint the family's exact residence.
