Historical Context

This document is an entry from a Catholic baptismal register (Taufbuch) from Arnstein, Germany. It follows a standardized tabular format typical of the late 18th century. The record captures essential genealogical data: the child's name, legitimacy status, parents' names and religion, residence (indicated by house number 173), the midwife's details, and the specific timing of birth and baptism. Such records served as legal proof of birth and religious affiliation. The inclusion of the midwife's name and residence was a common practice to ensure accountability and to record who might have performed an emergency baptism if the child's life was in danger. The house number 'N: 173' was a primary way of identifying the family's residence before modern street addresses were established.

Key Findings

This is a formal Catholic baptismal record for Franz Augustin, born and baptized on August 29 in Arnstein. He was the legitimate son of Johann Joseph Schutz and Elisabeth Wagner. The record also identifies the midwife, Anna Maria Metzger, and godparents Simon Warmuth and Franz Ludmayer, providing a clear snapshot of the family's social and religious circle in house number 173.

Suggested Next Steps

You should begin by searching for the Schutz and Wagner families in the Arnstein parish records available on MyHeritage. Look for the marriage of Johann Joseph Schutz and Elisabeth Wagner, which likely occurred in Arnstein or a neighboring parish a few years prior to this birth. Additionally, you can search for other children born to this couple at house number 173 to reconstruct the full family unit. Since the record is Catholic, you may also find confirmation records for Franz Augustin in the same parish approximately 10 to 12 years after his birth. For broader context, you might check the Bavarian State Archives (Bayerisches Hauptstaatsarchiv) for any local census or tax records from the Arnstein area during this period.
